The textile work, which was created on the occasion of an exhibition at the State Museum of Egyptian Art in Munich, represents a pattern for Egyptian full-body sculptures. It depicts the three classical positions in which a person was portrayed in ancient Egypt.

I sewed a person in the three classical positions of Egyptian figurative representation into nettle cloth, cut the material at the edges and inserted zippers into the seams. The pieces of cloth look like sewing patterns or architectural plans and leave it up to the viewer to combine them in his or her head to form a spatial structure.
